Tories leaning on May to be new PM as she plans to step down Conservative Party leadership candidate Andrea Leadsom arrives for the first leadership debate at the Civil Service College in central London, Britain May 12, 2016. REUTERS/Neil Hall By Robert Pritchard LONDON (Reuters) - The chances of a smooth transition to Britain's next prime minister from Theresa May after the country goes to the polls in June are "pretty close to zero," one of her closest Cabinet allies said on Tuesday. "You can't make those sorts of rules up," the source said, explaining that the party's top lawyers were leaning on Conservative MPs to back May as their leader after the election. A former prime minister, her predecessor David Cameron, is due to announce his resignation on Wednesday and leave office after May succeeds him. May, who wants to stay on, has been urged to name a new leader after the vote and could stand down herself next week. Leaders of the Conservative Party, which has traditionally dominated British politics, can be chosen by an internal ballot of party members and by the votes of MPs in the House of Commons. The source said they had been told it could take months to resolve the leadership issue. Another colleague said that while May might be able to stay on for a few weeks as she carries out her duties as prime minister, she was not likely to be able to remain for long. "There's no way that she's going to stay on for a year or two, at least at this stage," the source said. He said May was unlikely to have enough support in the House of Commons to remain even briefly after the election. A third Conservative lawmaker told the BBC that it had been made clear to him that May was likely to be the next prime minister. "Every senior minister is on the same page," he said. He said she was still the most likely candidate to become prime minister but "I think most people who know her think she's not going to be that person, at least for six months." He said Cameron's aides were pulling strings to try to persuade his successor to stand down. "It seems to me that his team are very keen that Theresa May goes first," he said. Cameron is due to announce his resignation on Wednesday before announcing who will
